If you're looking for the best possible viewing experience for your favorite movies, there are a few things to keep in mind. The first is resolution. How much detail can you see on your screen? A 1080p resolution will offer the clearest picture available. Watch 720p video on a 1080p screen and you'll see pixels jutting out at you left and right- it's not pretty! The next thing to consider is the bandwidth of your internet connection. Most of us take for granted the speed at which our internet download speeds operate. If you're downloading a movie that's over 3GB, you're looking at it with an internet connection that has just 1 or 2Mbps available to the device. Switch the resolution to 1080p and you'll see what we mean. If your bandwidth can handle both 1080p and 720p video, download at max. This will give you the best possible video quality. The bandwidth issue is one of the main reasons why it's best to buy movies online instead of at stores. This is because you can buy additional bandwidth if necessary (either via cable or wireless), but somehow it seems easier to watch your friends' pirated copy of "Titanic" on your laptop direct from Kazaa rather than be stuck using a fraction of your 1Mbps connection! Finally, make sure that the movie has been encoded at the highest possible quality. Most movies are encoded at 720p, which means that they're being downloaded in slightly over 100Mbps. A 1080p movie will require a higher bandwidth - more than your average internet connection is capable of. If the download only offers a certain quality, use another source. You can find high definition MKV or AVI files online from which you can burn a DVD or Blu-ray Disc. Then you have the ultimate viewing format for both PC and TV!
